Session Description:

Historic and master-planned communities feature buildings, parks, streets, and parking organized to create a cohesive community. However, most areas are comprised of small pieces of land, each owned separately. This ownership pattern often leads to just a collection of adjacent developments. What strategies can help landowners better coordinate with each other and local governments? How can we all achieve buildings and streets that relate to each other, coordinate parking, put density in the best places, and create high quality parks and plazas in the midst of fragmented parcel ownership? Join us to learn more about this exciting topic.

Speaker:

Scott Polikov, FAICP is a national leader advancing the New Economics of Place. He is well known for his work in unlocking the true value of neighborhoods, focusing on public-private partnerships to fund lasting design. Scott is the President of Gateway Planning, an urban design, planning and development consulting firm based in Dallas, TX.
